Afronomicslaw.org, the leading blog on international economic law and justice issues in the Global South seeks to fill the position of a Coordinator for its African Debt Justice Initiative (AfSDJN). The AfSDJN seeks to establish and galvanize members of the ASDJN to undertake contemporary research, advocacy and tactics around the changing nature of debt, globally and in Africa, which threatens economic development, social cohesion and a number of gains made in building social contracts in the recent years. It seeks to do this in a number of ways with a particular focus on Kenya, Zambia, Zimbabwe, Mozambique, Nigeria and Senegal through by producing research outputs, including toolkits, which enhance the advocacy interventions of these actors; creating awareness on and elevate the priority given to sovereign debt and other economic justice issues on the African continent and beyond, through its network activities which include public webinars, written symposiums and high-level interventions at important political events taking place on the African continent and beyond over the next 12 months; and increasing research engagement in the area of sovereign debt and other economic justice issues on the African continent by building human capacity and technical expertise on these issues. The work of the Network will press private and sovereign creditors to write-off, restructure or postpone debt owed by African countries and to focus the conversation on sovereign debt on the responsibilities of the lenders and not merely sovereign borrowers. It will also mobilize critical stakeholders who can influence policy on the debt question at the international, regional (African) and national levels with the select African countries aforementioned. The project will also support the institutional and administration needs of Afronomicslaw.org.
